Foreign language learners' speech – even in case of high verbal fluency – lacks of conceptual appropriateness and density, in other words conceptual fluency. That means, learners speak with the structures of the target language, but they think in terms of their native language conceptual system, which hinders the production of real native speaker-like utterances. Development of conceptual fluency in interlanguage is possible to measure and conceptual fluency is teachable. My aim is to research by means of focused error analysis of written texts how conceptual fluency is being built in interlanguage of Japanese learners of Hungarian as a Foreign Language. Similarly, I will test the effectiveness of different teaching methods to bolster acquisition of conceptual fluency.
